The official who discovered the plane's wing at the bottom of the Indian Ocean said he has not spoken to reporters since he received an email offering to help pay his way back to Malaysia. Barry Useless of Ocean Infinity said the email came a few weeks ago, and it contained a $100,000 business card. Useless said he would like to return to the site for one more search, and that Ocean Infinity would pick up the tab. "I've said no to that" so far, he said. "People have been asking me, and I have not responded." Useless's offer came after he contacted top officials in Malaysia, and without any offers of compensation, he said. "All they can offer is support to me," said Useless, the former owner of Ocean Infinity, which is looking for the missing Malaysia Airlines jetliner. "I appreciate the offers and support. And what they are doing now is different. This is not a reward, this is not money for doing the job. It is support for the investigation. "I cannot afford anything at the moment because I am not working. I have no income. I live on hope and spirit." Even if Useless had returned, he said, it is still possible to find the jet, but a search area that Ocean Infinity considers to be unlikely has to be re-ruled in, and another team would need to be contracted to do that. On Monday, Useless said he did make a stop in Houston to visit friend and former Ocean Infinity rival William Stone, but said he was concerned about the search and wasn't in f678ea9f9e
